

USAID/Nepal's six-year natural resource governance program closes this month. This program helped communities acquire and consolidate tens of thousands of hectares of forest under improved management; built stable, equitable and transparent systems of governance; supported issue-based advocacy and participation; and produced livelihood benefits for thousands of poor people. Impressed by USAID's achievements, Government officials plan to incorporate lessons learned and best practices of the program in their national development strategy.